Classic Case Study: Share-a-Coke Campaign

In this activity, you will take a look at Coca-Cola's iconic "Share a Coke" campaign, one of the most talked-about marketing initiatives in recent years. You will examine where it was launched, why Coca-Cola pursued it, the tactical steps that brought the campaign to life, and how its success was measured.

Please review the case study information and video below and then address the questions at the end.

Introducing the Share a Coke Campaign

Coca-Cola first introduced "Share a Coke" in Australia in 2011. Upon its initial launch, Coca-Cola bottles and cans featured some of the most common first names in Australia (e.g., Matt, Sarah, Alex, Jessica). The campaign was later expanded to numerous countries, including the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, and several others in Asia, Europe, and Latin America.

Each rollout included a localized list of names or popular nicknames in that specific region. And by using region-specific product packaging, Coca-Cola ensured that the campaign felt local and relevant. Different languages, cultural nuances, and name preferences were accounted for, making "Share a Coke" feel personal and special to consumers in each market.

The timing was also significant. By 2011, consumers were beginning to expect more personalized, relevant marketing experiences from brands. Coca-Cola spotted an opportunity to breathe fresh life into one of the world's most recognizable brand logos by essentially 'removing' the iconic Coca-Cola name and replacing it with a person's first name or nickname. This approach could be considered risky, but it quickly resonated with consumers who loved finding products with their name or personality attribute listed on the product.

Objectives and Target Market

The objectives of the "Share a Coke" campaign extended beyond simply boosting immediate sales. Coca-Cola sought to:

1. Re-engage younger consumers who often overlooked soda for trendier beverage choices.
2. Increase brand visibility on social media platforms by encouraging consumers to share photos of themselves enjoying a personalized Coke.
3. Drive emotional connections by associating the product with personal identity and moments of belonging.
4. Reinforce brand loyalty by offering a unique, interactive experience that felt special and collectible.

© Great Ideas for Teaching Marketing

Coca-Cola's target market varied by region, but they consistently focused on Millennials and younger audiences who value experiences and unique expression. By personalizing labels, Coke appealed to people's desire to see themselves recognized as individuals rather than simply part of a mass market. In addition, the campaign also reached a broader audience of families and older consumers enjoyed searching for their names and the names of friends, children, and colleagues.

Implementation

The Share-a-Coke campaign implementation relied on both online and offline tactics to amplify consumer engagement, such as:

- Personalized Packaging: Coca-Cola replaced its name on labels with top names in each region, inviting people to find a bottle that "spoke" to them.
- Pop-Up Kiosks: In many countries, pop-up stands allowed consumers to print custom labels with any name or short phrase, turning the experience into an in-person interactive event.
- Digital Integration: The brand created various online tools. For instance, a website allowed users to create virtual bottles with their names, share them on social platforms, and locate stores carrying certain names in stock.
- Social Media Buzz: Hashtags such as #ShareaCoke encouraged people to post photos of their personalized drinks. Coca-Cola regularly re-posted user-generated content, fueling a viral loop.

Additionally, television and billboard advertising reminded consumers to search for their names, but the real power of the campaign was from word-of-mouth, where friends and family members would show off their own named bottles. In this regard, the packaging was no longer a "throw-away" and virtually became a keepsake for a while.

Variations of the Campaign

Over time, Coca-Cola introduced multiple twists and expansions to keep "Share a Coke" fresh and culturally relevant:

- Expanded Name Lists: As the campaign progressed, Coca-Cola added more names, including nicknames and culturally significant variations.
- Emotions and Slogans: In some regions, the brand replaced names with sentiments like "Share a Smile" or "Share a Laugh," tapping into universal feelings that resonated just as powerfully.
- Emojis and Symbols: For younger audiences, Coke rolled out bottles featuring emojis, leveraging the popularity of visual communication among Gen Z and Millennial consumers.
- Custom Printing Stations: The ability to instantly print names or short messages on labels at special events became a popular attraction and a shareable experience.

© Great Ideas for Teaching Marketing

Through these variations, Coke kept the idea of "Share a Coke" exciting, ensuring that even consumers who had seen the campaign before might still want to participate in new and novel ways.

Metrics of Success

Market Share

When Share a Coke debuted in Australia in 2011, Coca-Cola experienced a dramatic turnaround. Local sales increased by approximately 7% during the summer launch, and advertising analysis reported that the brand's share of the soft drink category rose by about 4%, with young adult consumption up by 7%. This achievement was recognized as Coca-Cola's most successful summer in years. Source: Adweek

In the United States, the campaign helped reverse a decade-long decline in sales. During the summer of 2014, Coca-Cola's in-store volumes grew by about 0.4% and dollar sales increased by roughly 2.5% over a 12-week period. Overall, U.S. soft drink sales saw an uptick of over 2%—a noteworthy recovery after 11 consecutive years of falling volumes. Source: The Wall Street Journal

In the UK, the personalized campaign significantly boosted Coca-Cola's performance. During the campaign year, sales value increased by 4.9% to approximately £765 million, even as the overall carbonated drinks market only grew by 2.3%. Additionally, volume growth was around 3.9% despite a minor market contraction, illustrating a clear gain in market share over competitors. Source: Marketing Week

In China, Coca-Cola adapted the campaign by printing popular nicknames instead of conventional first names. This localized version contributed to a sales volume increase of about 4% in 2014. This boost played an essential role in strengthening Coca-Cola's market position in one of the world's fastest-growing beverage markets. Source: Forbes

Brand Health

The Share a Coke campaign not only lifted sales figures but also significantly improved Coca-Cola's brand health:

- Consumer Sentiment: Analysis showed that positive online sentiment soared—with roughly 45% of consumer feedback being favorable versus only about 5% negative. This shift represented an unusually positive response for a large global brand.
- YouGov Brand Index (UK): During the campaign, YouGov scores increased from 9.6 to 12.4, reflecting improved perceptions of brand quality and satisfaction.
- Engagement Among Younger Consumers: In the U.S., the incidence of Coke consumption among teens increased by roughly 5 points within an 8-week period, showcasing stronger brand connection and affinity.

Source: Adweek | Source: Marketing Week

© Great Ideas for Teaching Marketing

Social Media Engagement Metrics

Share a Coke was a viral social media success, generating vast engagement on major platforms:

- Facebook: During the first year, Coca-Cola's Facebook presence surged—gaining an estimated 25 million new followers, with an 870% increase in page traffic and a 39% growth in "likes." Source: Campaign Live
- Instagram: The #ShareaCoke hashtag generated nearly 590,000 posts with over 3.8 million impressions as users shared photos of personalized bottles. Source: Statista
- Twitter: The hashtag #ShareaCoke was tweeted approximately 89,000 times during the campaign's peak, generating over 51 million impressions and even trending globally on launch days. Source: Adweek
- YouTube: Campaign-related videos amassed millions of views. For instance, a viral video about personalized Coke bottles received over 4 million views, while Coca-Cola's own case study videos collectively garnered substantial viewership, with one series achieving around 2.1 million views. Source: YouTube

Customer Responses

Common feedback themes from customers on social media included:

- Delight and Surprise: People were excited to find products that felt personal, making the act of buying and gifting Coke bottles more meaningful.
- Collectible Factor: Some consumers gathered bottles featuring the names of all their friends and family, creating a buzz around searching store shelves.
- Personal Stories: Social media posts often featured anecdotes about gifting a named Coke to a loved one, generating heartfelt conversations about connections and relationships.
- Critiques and Limitations: Some consumers were disappointed when their names weren't available, or when the "Share a Coke" selection was too limited. This led Coca-Cola to expand its naming options over time.

Share-a-Coke Case Study Videos

© Great Ideas for Teaching Marketing

Student Discussion Questions

1. As a consumer, have you been exposed to the "Share a Coke" campaign – which still runs from time to time – and did (if at all) the campaign influence your perception of the Coca-Cola brand and did it influence your beverage purchasing behavior?

2. Outline the key factors of why this campaign resonated with the market and achieved positive sales results.

3. Why might younger consumers have responded more strongly to this campaign, as compared to older demographics?

4. How would you evaluate the success of the campaign from Coca-Cola's viewpoint and which metrics would be the most important ones to consider when evaluating the success of the campaign?

5. If a competitor brand tried something similar, what could they do differently to stand out or improve upon Coca-Cola's approach?

6. What risks do you see in removing the iconic Coke logo and replacing it with someone's name? Or do you believe that the Coca-Cola brand with its iconic colors is strong enough to not have its brand name on the packaging? Or to rephrase the question, could this campaign work for a less strongly branded product?

7. Are there any marketing lessons here for other product categories - or could this style of campaign only work for snacks and beverages?

© Great Ideas for Teaching Marketing